GOULD ACADEMY NOTES

We quote the following from the Lewiston Journel relative to the Lewiston Tournament: "The Tournament brought together eight coaches who are a credit to the game. Each and every one was a good loser or a good winner, as the case happened to be. It was particularly noticeable that Coach Anderson of Gould was the first to congratulate Coach Cole on Norway's victory. He also shook hands with each member of the winning team and complimented them on their fine play."

During chapel Monday morning Principal Hanscom presented to the school the second-place trophy enp won by the backetball team in the Lewiston Tournament. Doctor Honseom praised the accomplishments of the entire squad and the conches; life remarks were greated with prolonged applause for both the team and for coaches Anderson' and Myers.

Itonald Stanley, utility player on awarded a forward position on the met Wednesday, March 7, at the Gould basketball team, was All Tournament Five. Thomaston home of their leader. Adelaide and Norway each placed two players in the other four positions. the members started to make 50-50 money, Paul Browne and Stanley Allen savels, They played a few games Physician, were placed on the All Tourney Second-Team.

After the Great Earthquake in India

Monghyr, a city of 35,000 abubitants, was reduced to a pile of debris in the quake that shook central India recently. Throughout the 100 square miles affected by the temblor a death toll of from 8,000 to 10,000 was recorded, and countless thousands were injured and made homeless. Monghyr, a thriving community and center of the elemente industry, was almost completely wiped out. This is a photograph of a section of the city.

THE STORY

CHAPTER I .- Tom Jordan, young New England newspaper reporter it love with Jessica Poole, is barred from becoming an acknowledged sultor because of conditions of her father's will that her nusband mus-match her small fortune with his own. To do this, Jordan has a will hope of wealth from the salvage of a long-sunken French corvette.

CHAPTER II.-To Doctor White Jessica's guardian, Jordan reveal his hope. The doctor is skeptical Jessica's guardian, Jordan reventing his hope. The doctor is skeptical but for Tom's sake hopeful. Jessicatells them of an encounter she had with an ill-mannered sailor, and Tom's ire is aroused. Two frenchmen, the comte De Corluy and his son Robert, make their appearance. They claim that an ancestor of theirs commanded the Fourque (which was the name of the corvette) when she sank, and left writvette) when she sank, and left writ-ten record of treasure on board which they assert, as his descend ants, is their property. A Frenck sailor, Sebastien, also knows of the treasure, and is seeking it.

CHAPTER III.-After talking the atter over a form of partnership arranged between fom and the De Corinys to prosecute the search Jessica informs her guardian, to hu Jessica informs her guardian, to me surprise, that she has located the Fourquet, which is not where it hat been supposed, and by making a line fast to the hulk can estaunist a legal claim to salvage. She plant to do this early next morning. Doctor White, though with some misglyings, agrees to accompany her.

CHAPTER IV.—Robert De Corlay warns Tom that Sebastien is clever and unscrupulous. Tom, knowing it was Sebastien who had frightened. Jessica, is more than easer to spoi that worthy's plans. He and Robert reach an understanding to work together and divide what treasure may be "on the Job" at once they plan to forestall him.

CHAPTER V. - Doctor White chapter v. — Doctor White makes arrangements for a protessional diver to go down to the huik of the Fourquet next day. Early in the morning, in a dense for, the doctor and Jessica row out to the wreck. The diver falls to appear. Doctor White urges Jessica to nost pone her attempt to reach the Fourquet, but the girl is insistent.

CHAPTER VI.—Jessica dives and attaches the required line to the Fourquet. Then she and the doctor are dumbfounded by the appearance are dumbfounded by the appearance of Sebastien, with two companions. Doctor White tells him they have legally established a salvage claim, but Sebastien, feeling that he has them at his mercy, produces a revolver, apparently intent on killing both the girl and the doctor. He hestates when the sound of an apparently was the salvage of proaching boat, traveling rapidly through the fog is heard. Jengica feels, intuitively, that it is Tom Jordan coming to the rescue, and her heart fills with joy at this proof of her suitor's worthiness.

CHAPTER VII.—The night before, after the diver had set out for his appointment with Doctor White, he had been induced by Sebastien, who had learned of his errand, to take him aboard. The diver, Mike Castello, has whicky on his boat, and is frightened by the close proximity of another vessel, which he fears may be a revenue cruiser. Mike conceals the whisky in the dory attached to the boat, and thus gives Sebastien his chance to delay Castello's diving operations.

CHAPTER VIII.—Tom and Robert, believing they are following Sebastien, keep in the wake of the smack, but less it in the fog. Reeling their way, they suddenly find their propeller declines to budge. Investigating, Tom finds it is enveloped in the folds of an old fishing net, and correctly accribes the act to Sebastien. Working in the ley water, he disentangles the net, and they proceed. Robert reveals the location of the Fourquet, which Tom had not known. In their way to the spot they discover, at a landing station, a yowi which they recognize, and stop to investigate.

CHAPTER IX.—From Castello, who has put in there in despair, they learn that while on the yawl, they learn that while on the yawl, they learn that while on the yawl, the diver having been busy concealing the whisky. Sebastion had smashed the glass of the diving helmet and left the beat before the act had been discovered. Tom and Robert haster to the Faurhuet, convinced that Sebastion is on his way to that vicinity. The discovery, revealed by the diver, that Doctor White has planned to salvage the Fourquet is a surprise to Tom. As the doctor is Jecuica's mardian, he feels he munt withdraw from the enterprise. He proposes to Robert to Doctor White, the arrangement to split the hored for prize three ways still standing, but with Tom cut of it. It is so arranged.

Tom feared that it might be worth a lot to Sebastien, who would have had ample time by now to get round to his fishing ground.

"You and I may not have anything on the skunk," he said to Robert. "But Dave McFarlane has, and we can work that somehow. Let's run over and see If he is there, and if he's not we'll break out the doctor and get his view on where we all stand."

The red that had not yet cleared from Tom's value, may more than it might from that of the lighting bull which having churned and gored the wreteled crowbait bestridden by a pleador, casts about with lurid eyes for a more interesting victim.

Here was no time for abuse. It needed but a whisper, Schastien thought, to start Tom afresh on his devastating career. He could see that Tom was holding himself in leash, asking to be asked, when he would foam down again to smash him and his mates, rip them up, churn them into fish slum, egg-bent them up with his screw and generally shatter and stir them into fine particles suspended in brine.

He might have carried out this program without waiting to be invited, had not Doctor White called sharply, "Tom."

"Very good, sir." Tom moved slowly ahead toward the dory, Sebastien watching him warily and in silence. No doubt he was wishing there were not so many spectators for a little exhibition of knife throwing. But this was not the moment. Also, silence was golden. Tom gave him a stony glare.

got himself into another jam. He had taken it for granted that Doctor White must have decided to have a go at the wreck, no doubt as the result of that quick contagion of treasure seeking to which nobody seems Immune, and that his operations were based on some very intelligent deduction. So here now was Tom pledged to Robert that Doctor White would, on learning all the facts, back him up in his agreement, and I octor White acting as It appeared in behalf of Jessica, the latest claimant on the Fourquet.

The same reflection was flashed on Robert's mind. His face hardexed, but he asked politely, "On what does Miss Poole base her claim, sir?"

"On that buoyed line, of course, Lieutenant."

Robert made a despairing little gesture. "But surely, sir, you don't pretend to consider the buoying of a spot where the wreck might lie as enough to constitute an actual claim?"

Doctor White smiled. "That sort of location is sufficient in the case of gold or other mineral. You have only to drive your stakes, whether or not you know the stuff is there."

"But this is different," Robert "Yes, sir," Tom answered. In a protested. "It is not-how shall I sny-wild, or hitherto undiscovered. It is actual property-lost property-"

"Then what," asked Ineter White, "would you consider to constitute a really valid claim?"

"Nothing short of a line actually made fast to the wreck," Robert auswered promptly. "And even such a claim would of course be subject to contest if proofs of former ownership were established. That would, I admit, he rather difficult in such a case as this. But until a line is actually attached to the wreck, she is almost anybody's price, sir. We are living if a Machine Age. There is no denying the fact that one of the contributing factors to this protracted period of unemployment is the Machine. For the past one hundred years we have glorifled invention. We have almost canonized the individual who has lightened our labors and added to our leisure; but in spite of all the admitted a advantages that have come through these things, have we not become painfully aware of the truth of the old adage that "An idle brain (and we might include an idle body) is the devil's workahop"?
